At the halting-place we came upon another kafila which had preceded us. The pilgrims and travellers belonging to this caravan had not been by any means so fortunate as ourselves in escaping the violence of robbers. Several of them had been attacked and badly wounded. I myself saw one man, he was a native of Cashmere, with fair complexion and well built frame. His eyebrows and cheeks had been shockingly cut by the robbers, who had come upon him when he was a few paces from the kafila on the roadside, and attacked him from behind. His fellow-travellers, who were with the kafila, saw the attack and hastened to his rescue, but the villains escaped after badly wounding him. He had been observed to carry about with him a purse of money, which he wore round his waist, and this no doubt was what tempted the thieves to assault him. There were others in the caravan who had been wounded in a similar manner. They were all seriously injured; and the Cashmeree s case appeared to me to be hopeless, so badly had he been sliced about the face and eyes. These robbers always attack their victims from behind, and aim at the eyes and face first, with the object of blinding them. There was...
