The Crescent Regiment from New Orleans had been ordered to dislodge them. And the brave fellows had charged down the hill, over timber and through underbrush and woods, yelling and firing as they went, though shot and shell were plowing long furrows through their ranks. But still on they pressed. They had passed the hollow, and were just beginning the difficult ascent on the other side. All hearts were aching and prayers were going up. And then the blue eyes of Breckinridge were filled with tears, as through a rift in the smoke he saw the line on the face of the hill begin to waver a little and then fall back. It was a fearful moment. Death was shrieking in a thousand shells all about us, and solid shots were tearing the limbs from the trees overhead. Something must be...
