The movements upon the French side are, of course, better known. We must, as best we may, combine these with the observed, implied, or supposed movements upon the enemy's side, and so attempt a fairly consecutive description of the action. First, then, for the line of battle in the French center. The French center consisted, as we have seen, of a new army, part of that Mass of Maneuver upon which the French strategical theory relies. It was first grouped about a week before it came into action at the Marne, and was given, as we know, to General Foch, whose work upon the principles of modern war had already rendered his name familiar to the enemy. General Foch had under his command the equivalent of three corps only. He had the two divisions of the 9th Corps and the two of the...
