Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1888 edition. Excerpt: . . . gems appeared, many of them (as might be expected), in Jacques and Hercules examination papers at the Easter term. No wonder the worthy Pere felt a secret exasperation against such numskulls! Meanwhile, the gay little chums were anything but dull. Their brilliant vivacity and fun were the light and life of the pensionnat. Generous, daring, impetuous, each in his special manner evinced marked characteristics of Creole parentage. The peach-bloom splash in Hercules scutcheon must have been due to some remote crossing with the Teutonic race, prior to the migration of the nations to this country. But the youthful intensity, the verve, the poignant animal instincts prominent in Jacques seemed unadulterated Romance, and moreover Romance brought up under peculiar conditions, among the prairies tremblantes, the savannahs, the primeval forests, the wild, free civilization of a New World. Both the boys were from the Coast, sons of sugarplanters who owned many slaves, and had been sent to New Orleans in broad-brimmed hats and wide white Creole pantaloons to receive their education. They were intimate friends, attached to each other by ties of boyish association, and roomed in the same apartment of the school under Pere Senacs care. Their mothers had loved each other when they were little damsels at the convent; their fathers owned adjoining plantations, the arpents of one place overlapping the acres of the other; and the two boys had grown together into a comradeship which had its foundation in mutual scrapes, expeditions through the...
